MPs 'unprepared' for driverless future [2]

The comments came after a Dods Polling survey into MPs attitudes to driverless cars revealed a lack of knowledge amongst legislators on the impact of autonomous vehicles.

The survey showed that almost half of MPs questioned were against further investment in autonomous vehicle research, despite the Government announcing plans to have driverless cars being trialed on UK roads in 2015.

Trust in MPs at crisis point, campaigners say [3]

Less than a quarter of people trust their MP to represent them in Parliament, a survey has suggested.

It came as 86 out of 100 MPs asked in another survey said they thought they were trusted by constituents.

The survey of MPs was carried out by Dods Polling.

MPs: UK companies should be held to account for exploitation abroad [7]

British companies with factories overseas should be open to prosecution in the UK if they are found to have abused the rights or safety of their workforce, according to a majority of MPs.

A poll published on Monday says 71% of MPs questioned want British firms held to account in the UK for harm caused in developing countries, including allowing workers to bring civil cases in the UK. The move follows growing concern over human rights abuses, including poor working conditions, injuries and deaths at overseas factories used by British firms.

Dods Health reform research highlight the strong leadership role of CCGs but also the ongoing challenges we all need to tackle [8]

Dr Amanda Doyle, co-chair of NHS Clinical Commissioners and Chief Clinical Officer for NHS Blackpool CCG said:

“The Dods ‘Health reforms: a check-up’ recognises the important role that clinical commissioners now play in the wider health system, bringing new and innovative approaches to better healthcare for their local populations. We welcome the reports finding that CCGs are offering new local solutions to the system and are also a strong driver for change that engage and interact with key partners right across the health economy. However the report also reflects a number of the challenges our members face. Key amongst those is the financial pressures facing CCGs.”

Survey reveals negative feelings among public sector health professionals [9]

The online poll, run in July, asked whether people 'think the impact of the reforms has been positive or negative'. Of the 3628 respondents - 55% of whom have roles that involve frontline care - only 172 (5%) felt the impact has been positive, while 1388 (38%) said it's been negative. A third said the impact has been mixed, 17% felt it was too early to tell, and 8% said they didn't know.

The hostility to the reforms held firm across almost all levels of seniority, with the difference between positive and negative responses being 36% for the 1861 respondents in management roles and 32% for the 1424 outside management.

Only 5% of healthcare professionals think NHS reforms were 'positive' [10]

Only 5% of healthcare professionals think the recent NHS reforms have had a positive impact, a new study has found.

In July, Dods surveyed 3,628 health staff via an online questionnaire on their experiences of the reforms, the organisations driving change, and their expectations for the next 12 months.

The survey also found that only 2% believe their organisation has sufficient financial resources to support itself.

For many organisations in the NHS, improving patient care comes second to making efficiency savings, a new study by Dods has found.

Dods report shows that only 5% of health professionals think the health reforms have had a positive impact.

In July 2014, 3,628 health staff were surveyed via an online questionnaire on their experiences of the reforms, the organisations driving change, and their expectations for the next 12 months.

Savings not standards are priority, finds survey [12]

Efficiency savings are the top priority of many NHS organizations with improving patient care ranked in second place, finds a survey conducted by Dods, a provider of public sector and political research, surveys and polls. Only 5% of health professionals surveyed said they think the health reforms have had a positive impact.

Using an online questionnaire Dods surveyed 3,628 health staff about their experiences of the reforms, the organisations driving change, and their expectations for the next 12 months. NHS staff reported they are under heavy financial pressure. Only 2% said their organisation had sufficient financial resource to support their organisation.

Vast majority of NHS staff say reform had negative impact. [13]

□□ Only 5% of health professionals in the UK think reforms in the NHS have had a positive impact and many believe that improving patient care comes second to making savings.

That is the outcome of a survey from public services polling company Dods. Its analysis is based on replies to an online questionnaire in July by 3,628 health staff who were asked about their experiences of reforms from the Health and Social Care Act 2012, the organisations driving change, and their expectations for the next 12 months.□□ Money is a prime concern with only 2% saying their organisation had sufficient financial resource and 71% disagreeing with the idea that they have enough budgetary support to support their organisation.

Public sector lacks IT skills to deliver services effectively [14]

Almost half (45%) of public sector staff feel the workforce does not have the skills needed to continue delivering public services well, with 21% admitting IT is one of the most sought skills in the sector according to a survey by totaljobs.com and Dods Research.

The survey of more than 1,600 public sector workers from central government, local government and the health sector, identified several skills contributing to the IT gap.

Building a better working world for women [15]

EY's Worldwide Index of Women as Public Sector Leaders, published earlier this year, analyzes gender equality in public sector leadership around the world. What were the key findings?

Who leads the public sector is important. Public sector leaders – politicians, civil servants and board members – are responsible for the general welfare of their citizens and give protection to the most vulnerable members of society. Diversity, too, is crucial, because diverse teams are proven to stimulate innovation and new ways of problem solving.

Technology investment and staff training will enable local authorities to 'do more with less'

Three quarters of local government authorities (75 per cent) have embraced technology to transform their services, according to new research from BT. However, these organisations must now address IT skills gaps in order to increase efficiency and maximise the benefits from these investments.
